Today I Learned

Today I learned how to recognize different characters' points of view in stories by using different voices for each character. This helps me understand the story better and makes reading more fun!

Common Stumbling Blocks

Sometimes kids think all characters in a story share the same point of view, but each character has their own thoughts and feelings. Another common mistake is thinking that changing voices for characters isn't important, but it actually helps us understand the story better.

Help Me

When you read a story, try to think about how each character feels and what they might be thinking. Using different voices for each character can help you understand the story better and make it more fun. For example, if you're reading a story about animals, you can give each animal a different voice to show their unique personalities.
