

Verb Moods in English

Today's Standard

8.L.1c - Form and use verbs in the indicative, imperative, interrogative, conditional, and subjunctive mood.

Real-World Applications for this Standard

Writing persuasive essays using imperative mood.; Creating dialogue for a play using interrogative mood.; Discussing hypothetical situations in class using conditional mood.; Analyzing literature to identify different verb moods.; Practicing formal writing assignments using subjunctive mood.

Today I Learned

Today, we learned about different verb moods in English. Verb moods help us show different attitudes or intentions when we speak or write.

Common Stumbling Blocks

Sometimes, kids mix up the conditional and subjunctive moods. The conditional mood talks about things that might happen, while the subjunctive mood talks about wishes or demands. Another common mix-up is thinking the imperative mood is only for commands, but it can also be used to give advice or make requests.

Quiz Me

- What is the indicative mood used for?
- Can you give an example of a command?
- How do we use the interrogative mood?
- What does the conditional mood talk about?
- Can you tell me a wish using the subjunctive mood?

Help Me

Verb moods help us show different feelings or actions when we talk or write. For example, we use the imperative mood to give commands like 'Please sit down.' We use the conditional mood to talk about things that might happen, like 'If it rains, we will stay inside.'
